Abstract

What anthropologists call culture relates to the theory of behavior and ideas that manifest human groups or people in general. To know peoples across cultures we should follow the basic reasoning of anthropology. Language is the essence of our human being. Human languages are so complex that the scientific understanding of our ability to use language and the understanding of how languages are organized remain yet partial. Language is not only a phonetic and grammatical system, but it is the culture of people who express through it. Studying certain foreign languages means to study and understand what is in the genetic code of every people and nation's culture. Thus, there is a natural interdependence between two factors necessarily related to each-other. It is about language and culture. The analyzes of their cultures and their receptions are an important element that facilitates human relationships, helps in building bridges of communication and in releasing from complexes and prejudices as well. We must be careful with excessive stereotypes; it would be enough general information to get closer to cultural factors.
