Abstract

In a rapidly changing world, a world where as soon as a conflict is finished, another is open, it is normal to have uncertainties about the future of our nations and countries. It seems that the study of different political systems and regimes in the course of the centuries would bring out ideas on how the most basic struggle in politics: the battle between freedom and equality, has unfolded across the world. It has been an ongoing debate on comparison of regimes, because politics might have important implications from the way how societies identify themselves. In essence, political ideologies differ according to where they believe the proper balance between freedom and equality lies.
