The role of transport and infrastructure in regional cooperation in the Western Balkans and the EU countries is considered an important factor in the overall development of economic, social and environmental development of the region. In terms of economic development, the implementation of regional infrastructure projects has a positive impact on the regional economy as it participates in the opening of their markets to new business initiatives, and makes more efficient trade exchanges between countries in the region. Development of the Regional Transport Network in particular helps the governments of the Western Balkan countries tackle high unemployment initiatives, while increasing the overall economic development of the region. The Regional Transport Network also helps to improve cross-border cooperation and contacts between people, and has a significant impact on the environment.

For all these reasons, the European Union continues to have a direct interest in this sector, mainly the Western Balkans, as a region that lies at the heart of Europe.
